A Macdonald scheme. A scheme to develop the land for the benefit of the Aboriginal people. The government needed access to the land for settlement and development. The scheme involved the establishment of reserves for Aboriginal people to develop and benefit from the land.

The government needed access to the land for settlement and development. The scheme involved the establishment of reserves for Aboriginal people to develop and benefit from the land.
In other words, all they had known all their lives was gone.

The federal government, not the people who lived, it must be understood, that the houses are owned by the federal government, not the people who lived in them.

People who live in housing projects and feel that they are not being treated fairly often feel that they are being discriminated against.

Prior to 1975, the only Indian were people who lived in urban areas. In 1975, people from reservation areas were allowed to live in urban areas, and the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) began to develop policies to encourage voluntary and enforced removal of Indians from reservations.

The ultimate purpose of relocation was to reduce the Indian population and to reduce the number of Indian reservations.

In 1976, the BIA began to develop policies to encourage voluntary and enforced removal of Indians from reservations.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) began to develop policies to encourage voluntary and enforced removal of Indians from reservations.

In 1976, the BIA began to develop policies to encourage voluntary and enforced removal of Indians from reservations.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) began to develop policies to encourage voluntary and enforced removal of Indians from reservations.

The BIA began to develop policies to encourage voluntary and enforced removal of Indians from reservations.

The BIA began to develop policies to encourage voluntary and enforced removal of Indians from reservations.

The BIA began to develop policies to encourage voluntary and enforced removal of Indians from reservations.

The BIA began to develop policies to encourage voluntary and enforced removal of Indians from reservations.

The BIA began to develop policies to encourage voluntary and enforced removal of Indians from reservations.

The BIA began to develop policies to encourage voluntary and enforced removal of Indians from reservations.