Another Difficult Choice

The rectangular behemoths surrounded me, reminding me with their high-resolution faces of the testing task at hand. It may have seemed as if I was overly embellishing the complexity of the situation, but television shopping truly was proving to be a grueling experience for me. It was the prospect of having to make a choice that caused me a great deal of anguish, as I had been unable to make one for the entirety of my life. Even during this morning's breakfast, I had been torn apart like a binder at its susceptible seams, unable to select between corn flakes and raisin bran. As I still stood in the electronics aisle though, I couldn't help but contemplate that perhaps today I would overcome my struggles with decisions and emerge a more mature individual.

This transformation, however, would prove to be complex one. Currently, all aspects of my life provided evidence of my inability to make choices, even my attire. Each morning, I donned an unadorned black t-shirt, bland blue jeans, and simple brown sneakers, evidently lacking variety like a gray-scale printer. Even when it came to dyeing my hair, I was frozen at a crossroads, unable to make a move like a terrified burn patient in a restricting body cast. By now, I possessed a head full of steadily graying locks, falsely giving me the impression of being a wise individual; Clearly, it would be an unprecedented feat to alter these habits in a mere day.

Nonetheless, I was appalled by my present lifestyle and prepared to progress my views. Motivated by this absolute disgust, I began walking down the aisle, meticulously peering into each television's soul and searching for any hints of imperfection. Failing to detect much variation, I then proceeded to inspect each television's information card, hoping to make sense of the technological jargon. Again, however, I was unable to make significant progress.
